1. .. Brief Sketch of My Life

Now I will narrate my life in brief sketch. Without exaggeration and without self- prociation I will tell what I mysolf believe is true.

My family lived for several hundred years at Minamata, which is bordered by mountains and facing on the sea. It is located close to Satsum Province at the southern tip of Higo Province in Kyushu. In the national history written one theusand years ago, Minamata appears as one of the postal service stations stablished by the central Government.

My family was neither wealthy now poor. In its native place it was of a prominent stock. From generation to generation its members were appointed local officials, and engaged themselves in river improvement, reforestation, reclamation and other work. They also established schools to promote local education.

My Father was a disciple of YOKOI, Showan, and in the renovation of the Meiji Restoration contributed not a little to the administrative reformation of the Kumamoto Clan.

XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX

Not only was YOKOI, Shonan, my Pathor's teacher, but also we were YOKOI's relatives by marriage, for his wife was my Mother's sister. I myself have been one of birl hip Ainlegal Bhoorg/doc/bb5d6f/throughout their lives follo ed Snonan's academic views.

Shonan was one of the principal characters who affected the reformation of the Ariji Restoration. It is true that he was not the author of the "five-articled Imperial Convenant," which constituted the cardinal principle of the basic national policy in the Restoration. Powever, WWRI, Kimimasa, one of his disciples, drafted the Convenant's first manuscript.

It was completed through joint efforts by many other collaborators and revisors. Nevertheless, there is little doubt that its guiding spirit is based upon Shonan's inspiration upon this point I have made detailed comments in my "National History".

Born in 1963(The third year of Bunkyu), around 1375 (the sixth year of Meiji) I entered the Kumamoto Yagakko, where I studied English under Captain Zens, and american. In 1376 (the minth year of Meiji), I went to Tokyo, thence proceed and to Kyoto, where i entered the Doshisha College and became a disciple of MIIJI..., Jo. was at the University till 1390(the thirteenth year of Meiji); just before graduation, however I had a conflict of views with the University authorities, and without graduating left Doshisha for Tokyo.

Thile it the University I studied elements of history, politics, economics, and other sciences under Dr. Larned, an imerican. My academic career ended here.

1929 (the fourth year of Showa) as the president and concurrently the editor-in-chief of the newspaper Kokumin, and thence till the termination of hostilities as the guest of the newspaper Mainichi, I devoted most of my time to literary work.

In addition to the publication of newspapers, I established the Mingusha Publishing Company, and engaged in the publication of books and magazines. My works published by the Mingusha and elsewhere total several hundred.

.gain, I rendered assistance to NIIJIM., Jo in his efforts to find a university. Ifter his death, in order to fulfill his wishes, I became the chairman of its founding committee, and contributed my small share to the work.

For nearly a decade 1 did my best in the capacity of supervisor of the newspaper Reijo Nippo in Korea.

By establishing the "Kokuminkyoiku Shoreikai" (the Mational Education Promotion Society), I rendered service to the national education, and by founding the Loyama Kaikan (the Loyama issembly Hall), I strove for the promotion of adult and social education.

Yet what I concentrated my best efforts on, other than the newspaper work, was the compilation of Japanese history. To this work I have devoted nearly thirty years of my time, publishing seventy-odd volumes and completing over ninety volumes of manuscripts.

For this accomplishment I was awarded an Imperial prize through the Imperial academy, given the Prince arisuguma's Scholarship, and was appointed a member of the Imperial academy. Shortly after this I was appointed also a member of the Imperial academy of arts. In 1911 (the forty fourth year of Heiji) I was nominated by the Emperor a member of the House of Poers. I was also awarded in 1943 (the eighteenth year of Showa) the Cultural medal. I gave up all these last year. I have confined myself now to my home and am now nursing my illness.

II. Key to Japanese History (1)

Today the Japanese people are regarded as a war-like nation; and the Imperial policy of the Meiji Restoration is misun erstood as having aimed at Japan's armed invasion of the world. This is not confined to foreigners, but at present even certain Japanese have come to hold such a view.

If this is not a biassed interpretation, it is a misunderstanding. As a student of Japanese History I feel keenly my own responsibility to elucidate the truth of the matter.

XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX

If I am to give first my own conclusion of my study in Japanese history, I say the Japanese are second to no people or nation in the world in their love of peace. The Imperial policy in the fieiji Restoration aimed at having Japan, theret fore isolated from international society, join this society so that she might finally be in a position to do creditable service as member of it.

In a word, the Imperial policy was so formed as to have Japan progress of its own accord to other Powers' level, stand on an equal footing with them, and attain a status for maintaining harmony with them. In this sense one can nover attach to Japan any intention of world invesion according to the Imperial policy. Throughout her career Japan has had no intention of invading the world, but has rather been in the fear of being invaded by the Powers. That she has been concentrating her energies on self-defence alone is the fact shown all through Japanese history,

PURL: http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/bb5d6f/

0 164 0002 20 14

DEF DOC # 632

I should like to cite instances here to prove my point; only that would amount to my giving a lecture upon Japanese history.

I regret I am obliged to give here only conclusion induced from facts. Self-defence has been the most important matter for Japan. For this purpose her ancient Government erected barricades in the north-eastern province, dug moats in the south-western region, stationed a commander of local government in the north-eastern province, and guarded the south-western region with a conscripted garrison with permanently established headquarters.

It was not for the reason of its socurity alone that the Tokugawa Shogunato adopted the policy of national soclusion.

The Shogun closed the country to foreign intercourse lest Japan should be invaded by foreign Powers. In a certain respect this policy had something in common with the American Monroe Doctrine.

To say nothing of historians of other countries, even Japanese historians do not understand what the Japanese national characteristics are like.

It is extremely difficult we state here in a nut shell the Japanese national characteristics, Japan's traditional national policy derived there from, and the history of how the traditional policy gave rise to the refermation through the Restoration. However, I should like to produce here a key for understanding all there.

Anat constitutes such a key? It is the Act that Japan had as her neighbour to big continental Power in China, which not only had far more extensive territoric and far more numerous population, but also possessed a much higher culture than Japan.

In a certain sonse it might be said that, mostly the Japanese national characteristics have been contributed to by, or been created under the influence of, China, if now moulded by China.

Temporarily disrogarding Japan's ancient history, when the Japanese about gained their self-consciousness, as broughtout above, they either became conscious of or felt unconsciously, the existence in their vicinity of a country whose land and population both were more than ten times or scores of times larger, and whose culture was far higher than Japan's.

Thus the Japanese felt culturally toward China deep emotion, great admiration strong envy, and deep longing.

Forgotting every thing else, they strove to imitate China. At the same time Japan wondored how she could preserve her ewn independent self desides such a great country. First came the competitive spirit for elevating Japan to an equal footing with China, culturally and in other respects. Yet however bitterly Japan strove, she was an island country with small population. However closely one tries to imitate a branch or a retail store is no match against its principal or wholesale store.

Thus, on the one hand, Japan did her best to imitate or to learn from China in every possible field; on the other, she strove to possess semething which China lacked, whereby to keep up rivalry with her.

This made Japan acquire a strong imitative ability and adoptability. ..t the same time it helped her to cultivate a national characteristic of trying to find something which was peculiar to her alone. Traces of all these are clearly found in the Japanese today.

a 164 - aaaa - ,20 16

It is a serious mistake to make the charge that Japanese they are selfconceited enough to regard themselves as superior people, and to look down upon other nations. All that the Japanese hoped for at first was, that, though the Japanese were no equal to the Chinese, Japan might at least maintain her national prestige by imitating China's culture. In the next stage the Japanese aims were if China was superior in quantity, Japan should improve in quality;
if China excelled in number, Japan should show higher grade; and if China beasted of her nationals, Japan should improve her spirit. The Japanese eventually managed to acquire consciousness that Japan at last had attained an equal footing with China on the score that, though China was a continental Power, at every revolution its dynasty changed,; and that though an island country, Japan was ruled by an ever-unbroken line of Emperors.

DEF DOC # 632 III. Kay to Japanese History (2)

0 164 0002 20 19

In order to leasn Japanese history it is best to make Japan's principal figures its index. One of the most suitable of such characters is Prince Shotoku.

He was the emportment of the Japanese people's admiration for China; and yet at the same time their rivalry against China was crystalized in him. On the one hard the Prince alopted Chinese culture and, institutions and, on the other, he despatched official decuments, the salutations of which were, "The Pastern 'Taube' informs the Western Emperor,"1, or "The 'Tenne' of the Jountry of the Aloung sum informs the Emperor of the State of the Setting Sum. 11.

Generally speaking, whatever objects existed heretofore in Japan have been created to match similar ojects in China.

The Mausoleum of the Emperor NINTOKU, for instance, which ranks among the grandest mausolea in the world, was erected probably in order to emulate such as the Li-Shan Mausoleum of the Founder of the Chin Dynasty, the Quicary Mausolea of Han, the Chao Mausolea of Tang, and so on. The same could be said of the great image of Buddha at N.R., Again, it was the same motive that led to the compilation of the "NIFFONSHOKI," deservingly called the fountain-head of the Japanese history.

The Japanese at times felt respect for and at other times stood in fear of China; but despite respect and fear, their greatest efforts were directed to the maintenance of an independent status towards China

L EF LOC # 632 and also to the demonstration of such.

Among the leading thinkers in Japan, there were seemingly two currents, one pro-Chinese and the other anvi-Chinese. As a matter of fact, however, these two currents were traceable to one and the same source. The basic conception that Japan could not possibly cope with China developed, in passive minds, into zealous adoration towards China, and in defiant minds, into rivalry, if not antagonism. It was for this reason that the vast majority of the most prominent nationalizts in Japan ranked at the same time among the greatest sinologues.

SUGAMARA, Michizane, famed as the Fai Le-Tien of Japan, upheld the theory of being "spiritually Japanese even if culturally Chinese," admonishing that the Japanese, while copying Chinese arts, should take care not to lose the spiritual characteristics as Japanese. We have another example in KITABATAKE, Chikafusa, author of the "JINNO-SHOTCKI," which is the most excellent Japanese history of individual authorship. He was conversant not only in Chinese classics but also with teachings of such scholars as Cheng Chu, closer to him in the point of time; he was also well read in Chu Tzu's "TSUGAN-KOMAT", Yet, he opened his "JINNO-SHOTCKI" with the specially emphatic statement "Japan is the country of gods," thereby giving Japan a position more than equal, and even superior, to that of China.

He had two major objectives for writing this book. The first objective was, as anyone would notice, to establish that the Southern Dynasty was the legitimate line of the Imperial Family of Japan. Secondly, he declared, with firm confidence, that not only was Japan superior, in the point of national policy, to such powers as China and India, but also she was more advanced, though few people seem to pay any attention to this second point. In short, the two major protests, that is, the protest of the Southern Dynasty against the Northern Dynasty, and the protest of Japan against China and India, constitute the very essence of this work.

0 164 0002 20 19

However, dissenting ideas, too, had attained considerable popularity in Japan. A Zen priest named ENCETSU, a near contemporary of KITY DATLKE, Chikafusa, wrote a book entitled "CHUSEISHI," declaring that the ancestors of the Japanese Imperial Family had been the decendants of Tai-Po of the Wu Dynasty. Because of this he incurred adverse criticism of the Imperial Court and the book was subsequently ordered to be destroyed by fire.

On the other hand, the views of another Zen priest KOKAN who wrote the "GENKYO-SHLKUSHO," a kind of Buddhist history of Japan, belonged to a trend of thought similar to, if not the same as, that of CHIKLEUSA's.

At the beginning of the Edo Era, YaMaGa, Soko wrote the "Facts About CHUCHO," setting forth his own opinions concerning a chapter, entitled "age of Gods," of the "NIPFON-SHOKI." In reality, however, he merely added but little to what had already been set forth by KITABATAKE, Chikafuse. By CHUCHO he meant Japan, not China, and from the very title of the book, the contents would be self-evident. YaMaGa, Soko, too, was one of the most celebrated sinologues in those days.

About this time the EDO Shogunate ordered the compilation of a Japanese history to the HAYASHI Family --- that is, HAYASHI, Pochut, his son Shunsai, and so on ---- who were responsible for the educational affeirs of the Shogunate. This book was known as the "HONCHO-TSUGAN." when the work was completed, it so happened that MITO, Mitsukuni, a relative of the TOKUGAWA Shogun and popularly called the Vice-Shogun, happened to censor it, before it was presented to the Shogun for inspection. At the wholly unexpected passages asserting that the Imperial Family of Japan had been descended from Tai-Po of the Wu Dynasty, MITSUKUNI became infuriated and it is generally held that the indignation actuated him to compile the "DAINIPFONSHI," a golden rule, so to speak, of the Japanese history.

Although personally speaking, I do not suppose such was necessarily the only motive for the compilation, yet at the same time, I do not think this the kind of idea to be dismissed with a smile.

idolators of China. ASHIKAGA, Yoshimitsu, for instance, used to take pride in his crown and clothes sent from China. At his death, he was given by a Chinese friend of his the posthumous name of "KYOKENO."

After the TOKUGAWA Era, however, rivals other than China appeared, namely, western countries. Thus far China had been Japan's only neighbour; but since ocean navigation came into vogue, the number of Japan's big neighbours increased, that is, Western powers appeared. When the single neighbour China had been troublesome enough, the sudden appearance of so many new neighbours was unbearable. So, the Shogunate, deciding upon the policy of keeping them off as much as possible, issued a decree of national isolation. In spite of this, they came. The greatest of these neighbours was Russia. Japan had from the beginning respected China as a civilised nation; but the Russians she had feared as "red barbarians" rather than regarding them as a civilised people.

In the "Modern History of the Japanese People," I have stated at length how great was Japan's fear towerds Russia and how deep was her worry over what should be done to meet Russia's southward advance. Side by side with the fear towards foreign countries, there grew also aspiration after foreign culture, as was evidenced by the enthusiastic study of the Dutch language. This, too, I have already related in detail. What the Japanese feared most was at first Russia; but by and by Britain became another object of fear. While Russia disturbed Japan's northern frontier, Britain, in violation of the Shogunate's national isolation decree, impudently forced her way into the Nacasaki Harbour. The Magistrate of Nacasaki, taking the response bility upon himself, committed "harakiri,"

Furthermore, the news of Britain's activities extending from the Indian Ocean to the China Sea constantly reached Japan. In point of national defence, the Japanese became greatly concerned as to whether or not Japan, now hemmed in on both sides by Russia and England, could possibly maintain her independence. Confronted with such a situaPURL: http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/bb5d6f/tion, Dutch scholar SUGITA, Gempaku, for instance, maintained that since after on, about the time Commodore Ferry came to Japan, Hashimoto, Sanae, man of long sight, argued that it was recessary for Japan, new to become allied either with Resia or with Private and that, however, since Britain was cunning and hard to deal with, it was better to league rather with Russia. In short, the Japanese had substantially the same mental state, only more magnified and exaggerated, towards the Western powers as she used to have towards China. Far from contemplating aggressions, Japan was simply in awe and trepudation lest she herself should be invaled by foreign powers.

Desides, at the bottom of their heart all the Japanese, wise or otherwise, believed from their respective standpoints, that Japan could not possibly cope with, far less excell, other countries, although nobody dared to speak out. About the time of the MATHI Restoration, there was not a single soul in Japan who believed Japan to be the greatest country in the world, who considered the Japanese as the greatest people, who thought of invading other countries, or who had a sense of superiority towards other nations.

These, however, were more boastings unfounded on any conviction. At bottom, whey are traceable to the same motive as gave rise to the idea.

IV. MOTIVES OF THE MEIJI RESTOR.TION .ND BASIC FOLICIES

I could not possibly enumerate here all the factors leading to the restoration. The most decisive motive or the root cause was that the Shogunat could not possibly maintain the independence of Japan; that, if left solely to the administration of the Shogunate, Japan might be invaded by various foreign countries and there was no telling what a miscrable plight Japan would find hereself in, what dishonour she would incurr, and what total collapse Japan herself might most with; that, therefore, the unification of Japan, with the Imperial Family at the very center, should be effected; and that the entire Japanese nation should do their best to defend Japan, so as to enable her to maintain her status as a fully independent state. Under such circumstances, the reform was effected in a short time and almost without any great difficulties.

Consequently, the basic policy after the Restoration was nothing but to effect these aims, that is, firstly, to put Japan in a position free from foreign invasion; secondly, to let her attain perfect independence; and thirdle to enable her to join the international society and, as a member or an important member of the society, to act like a power in her dealings with various other powers. As a basic policy for the realization of these PURL: http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/bb5d6f/objectives was promulgated on 15 Parch in the year 1868 or the first year of MEIJI "The Imperial Covenant consisting of Five Articles." This Covenant determined the basis of Japan's national policy and served as the criterion for all matters. For about 80 years are its promulgation, up to the present day, almost everything has conformed, although with occasional digressions, to this covenant.

The political leaders of the MEITE Restoration were SANDO, IVATORIA, SANDO, OKUPO, and KIDO. Apert from them, YOKOI. Sannan, was one of those, though not necessarily the only one, who drew up the general outline of the Restoration, or in other words, who wet forth the fundamental principles.

The "inspiration" of the Covenant was given by YOKOI, Shonan, to YURI, Kimirasa, the drafter or one of the drafters of the Covenant. This YURI, Kimirasa, himself knows better than anybody else.

YOKOI, Shonen, was not one of the so-called doctrinaires cerried away by empty ideas and ideals. As even his of monets called his group "Practical Theorists," he kept his feet firmly on the ground while his face was turned heavenward. He was always trying to realise ideals and to idealise realities.

Immediately after the Festeration, he was summoned by the Emperor, and he started from his home in the HIGO Province for KYOTO. On this occasion,

YURI, Kesei, ---- then known as LITSUOK. Hechiro ---- belonging to the HIZEN

Province, who had been appointed some time carlier to be a councillor of the

Imperial Court, came to OSAK. to most YURI: According to what YURI says

(cf. "The Manuscripts Left by the Late Shonen") YOKOI then told YURI that Japan was truly a blessed country firstly because she had the Imperial Family of an unbroken lineage, and secondly, she was opened later that Abounce 1 and 1 powers of the world.

Sotting aside for the present the question of the unbroken lineage, what YOKOI meant was that not only were the Japanese able to make one grip of all sorts of knowledge that the Westerners had spend long years of hard application to acquire, but also the Japanese were able to choose between the merits and demorits of the Western culture, and that, therefore, they could learn much more in a much short period of time. YOKOI, according to him own words and writings, had great expectations for the Emperor MEIJI, who then was still in his boyhood. YOKOI firmly believed that this Emperor alone would be able to add glory to the restored administration. Although he himself was assessinated shortly afterwards by members of the Extreme Conservatives, his aims were brought to fruition by his disciple and friend MOTCDA, Eifu.

YOKOI wished, if possible, to go over to the United States himself, and convene, with the approval of the President, an interactional peace conference, for YOKOI believed that the greatest contribution Japan could make to the world was for her to take an initiative in the realisation of the interactional peace. His death, however, prevented him from carrying out his ideal.

As is evident from what KOTON, said about YOKOI (cf. "The Manuscripts Loft by the Late Shonan") YOKOI worshipped Washington, next to Yoo Shun, ideal monerch of China, and used to maintain that the severeign of a country should follow the example of "cshington. It was his conviction as a Confucianist that the idea "Benevelence disarms enemies" could be put into actual practice. He aimed at a new code of political othics and believed that the work of othicisation should start with the hore and gradually proceed to the town and village, the entire country, and finally to the whole world. It is needless to say that the post-Restoration government was formed indeed out of civil wars but by no means for the purpose of weging further wers, and its chief object was not only to maintain the sway of peace within the country but also to realise international peace throughout the world.

These observations of mine are by no means desk theories. As a close examination of every one of the leading figures among the organisers of the post-Restoration government would disclose, there are no traces in the fact of any imperialists ever manipulating or directing the fundamental policies of the post-Restoration period.

In particular, the leading politicians of the post-Restoration government of Japan, such as IVLKURA, KIDO, OKUBO, and so on made between the end of 1873 (the 6th year of MEIJI) a tour of inspection through America and Europe and seeing with their own eyes the actual conditions of various Anglo-American countries, came to the conclusion that Japan, as she was then, was no match for these countries, that the most important duty for Japan is to elevate her international status, and that, in order to do so, it was most urgent for her to copy after the good points of foreign countries. From their tour they came back with a firm determination to effect these objects. Under these circumstances there is not a scintilla of truth in the allegation that the post-Restoration government was a militalistic regime or that it was the forerunner of Japan's militarism. In the early stage of the Restoration, the Emperor MEIJI was still young and he had not yet acquired the ability to take administration into his own responsibility. From 1877 (the 10th year of MEIJI) enward, the Direct Imperial Rule, thus far only noPEIRalhugg/wakwalkigl-tocksorg/doc/bb5d66/to be realised. Among the political advisors, the two in whom the Emperor used to place greatest confidence were IMAKURA of carlier days and ITO of later years. Both of them were peace-loving politicians and no one would think of them, even for a moment, as militarists. And a Japanese who exerted e most profound influence on the Departr Manji was Erfu, MOTODA. "The lectures given by Professor MOPOD. in the impartal presence, published by me, shows what he told the sovereign. He was a simili-scale Shonan YOKOI but he was devoid of his flaw of roughness and endowed with the sheen of a burnt gold and a pure gom. And so was his view. A foreigner who excercized a greatest influence on the Emperor was General Grant, sometime President of the U.S When he came to Japan in the autumn of the 12th year of Meiji (1879), the Emperor Moiji talked with him with unusual argour. A youth of 28, as he was then, listened to the edvices of General Grant which impressed him deeply. The General discouraged rather than encouraged over-zealous Europeanization of Japan. He expressed to the sovereign his fervent wishes that Japan would become a completely independent State and free horself from undue influences of the foreigners. The collected poers of the Emperor Meiji are elequent how he was a model momerch of perceful international conciliation. Thus, the Emperor, who was the pivot of the Maiji Government, and all the influential statesmen who assisted him were no militarists. Nor even a slightest trace of militarism was found in them. It does not require any special explanation on my part that such Emporor, such Government had no occasion for a conspiracy of world domination.

In short, until the middle of the Meiji Bre, both the government and the people were occupied sedulously on the cchievement of complete independence. What harassed them most were extraterritoriality and absence of tariff autonomy. They were determined to recover their teriff and judicial rights at any cost. But the nation was divided into two factions over the question. The one faction proposed to raise the cultural standard of Japan speedily, and to plan and effect Europeanization of Japan to ease and satisfy the foligners. The other faction rejected Europeanization of Japan and considered it a shortcut to make the Europeans give in and propose voluntarily the revision of treatics through numerous inconveniences and difficulties they were sure to feel if they should keep the Japanese in the lurch. In another word, the latter advocated strict observance of the treaty terms in opposition to the Europeanizetion policy of the former. For, should these terms be observed to the letter, the foreigners would not be allowed to prospess, for example, an inch further the ten ri limit of free passage which was stipulated by treaties. They would be then nonplused by such constraint and obliged to propose a treaty on equal terms. Fublic opinion was agitated but excitement subsided after the 27th and 28th years of Meiji (1894-5) when the question was settled of itself. The western powers recognized the continuous offorts of the government and the people since the Meiji Restoration and admitted the growth and development of Japan which the years had brought on her, if not as their equal. Thus Japan rehieved her complete independence, as described by Ceneral Grant, thirty years after the foundation of the Meiji Government.

V. Internal and external stimuli to modern Japan.

It was the wostern proors that taught Japan that she did not need to fear China. Japan not only followed their precept faithfully but became fully awake to the weakness of China. Repect and fear Japan had had towards China were now turned with doubled intensity to the western powers. However, there were such persons in Japan who did not concur with the current of the age. In the early years of Meiji, Keiu NAKAMURA published his view that China should not be held in contempt, warning the Japanese to modify their attitude towards China. In the years prior and after the Sinc-Japanese War in the 27th and 28th years of Meiji (1894-5) when the Japanese people were elated with realization of vincibility of China, Kaishu KATSU cautioned them against their flippancy, drawing their attention to the superior intelligence and discretion of the Chinese people.

New at this juncture I should like to say a few words on the Sino-Japanese War. The Sino-Japanese War can be consider ed as a continuation or repetition of the war which was fought in Korea against China in the reign of the Emporor Tenchi about 1,200 years ago, i.e. in the 7th century A.D., the only difference being that the Japanese influence in Korea was completely driven out by China by the war of ancient days and the Chinese influence in Kerea was almost entirely driven cut by Japan by the war in the 27th and 28th of Meiji, Korea had been the front line of Jepsn's defence since the ancient days in Japanese history. After complete evacuation of Japan from Korea, Japan redoubled the defence of Kyushu. But it did not prevent the attack of the Mongolians who used Korea as the basis of operation. Fortunately the "divine wind" drave away the Mangalian troops. But it did not mitigate her fear. Japan had since attempted to despatch troops to wipe out these basis of operations though the plans did not materialize because of her internal situation. In the 6th year of Meiji (1873) Takamori SAIGO and others advanced the so-celled "Advocacy of the Korean invasion" but their real intention was to confront Russia by concluding a defonsive alliance between Japan and Korea. The opposing parties made objections in fear of possible friction. Opinions differed between these parties for and against the proposed campaign only as regard to the method and policy of defense against the foreign powers, but there was no such difference as to the fact that Korea was the front line of Japan's defense. which had been a common knowledge since the foundation of Japan.

New I resume the subject I left. China had made so little of Japan from the very beginning. But she became of ended by and Korea. Not only did she contempt and disdain but begin to hate; become indignant, and fear Japan. She adhered to he r traditional policy of befriending distant States and antagonizing neighbours, and revenged herself on Japan by restraining Japan through the influence of the foreign powers. But this was not a wise policy for her, for the so-colled breaking-up of China originated in it, to say the least of it. Even during the Sinc-Japanese War, however, no small number of the Japanese hoped to shake hands with China. Pacifist statemen like ITO were these. General KAWAKAMI, a Japanese Moltko of the Sinc-Japanese War, was also a very anthusiastic advocate of the cause. Neither did China lack those who considered Sino-Japanese co-operation advantagous to her in the long run. But the majority of the Japanese drotrinated with contempt for China. They made no particular study of her nor preparations, considering China as a stone lying in front of a gate which one can mave at one's will. The Chinoso, on the other hand, soothed with resentment and revenge, waiting for an apportunity for reprisal. But in view of the formidability of Japan, they protended innecence for the time being and patiently watched for such chance. Thus Japan and China had never reached mutual understanding and fr.endship in spita of their affinity gargraphical and ling listic since the Meiji Reservation. Of course, among the individuals of the two nations, considerable intimacy had 0 164 0000 2032 dovoloped, but as a nation their relationships had remained superficial throughout. They never had an occasion of whole hearted occperation. It is not proper for me to discuss the right and wrong of the China Incident, so I will not dwell on this point any further. Japan paid dearly for her contempt of China, which has almost ruined her. Had the Jananese understood and studied China better, had they acted with more prudence, the present state of affairs would never have occurred. The present disaster may probably attributed to their lack of presence of mind. At any rate, the Japanese considered the Chinese as a race like sand. The Chinese on their part made the most of antagonism, hostility, and rovenge against the Japanese --- or rather stimulated and enkindled antagonism against Japan, as we might say. Thus Japan played a part of cementing th sand of the Chinese, consolidating a heap of sand into a towering citadel of concrete. China had contributed to the development of national spirit in Japan. And now Japan in her turn paid back her obligation with intorest, having contributed to the advent of the Kucmintang and the communist party in China. The United States deserted Japan in favour of China, but whother it is a change for the better, I am not in a position to say. History will show it in the nearest futuro.

The schooled militarist elique never existed in Japan.

I can firmly say so with my conscience. I am an old man, and as I have been connected with the Press since my mature days,

I have met all kinds of the Japanese people. I was a war correspondent at the time of the Sinc-Japanese War. I we tohed the development of the Russe-Japanese War as a closely interested party. I have never hesitated to express my views on the military and other questions.

Field Marshall YAMAGATA was the loading man and the helm of the Japanese Army. YAMAGATA, as Hemo Minister, twice Premior, and later Elder Stateman, exercised a most profound influence on politics in general, though he himself was a military. He refermed the military system of Japan and enforced the conscription law, thus abolishing the privileged class of samurai numbering 500,000 or 2,500,000 including their family, and making the entire nation share the duties of national defense. He personally attended the coronation of a Czar in Moscow as the delegate of Janan. E. was a most enthusiastic advocate and supporter of the Anglo-Japanese allience. His illustrous doed was the establishment of self-government in Japan. He was probably one of the greatest statemen of Japan in the last one hundred years, though I do not shere his political views. He was not a militarist. He wished to complete armament, but it was for the sake of peace and noticenal defense of Japan. He proved to be a sedative rather than a stimulant to the military in general. (See the "Life of Prince YAMAGATA," which is a true account of his life, written byport http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/bb5d6f/ - 34 - about SAIGO, Jr., YAMAMOTO, TOGO, and others, who were the leaders of the Navy. Especially SAIGO and YAMAMOTO were advocates of international conciliation and stood firmly against starting troubles upon initiative of Japan. The influencial persons in the Army and Navy, so far as I know, were no exceptions. For example, upon his departure from Japan as Commanderin-Chief of the Manchurian Army, Field Marshall CHAYAMA was reported to have left a cordial message (T.N. to the Government) that he would take full charge of military operations but they (T.N. the Government) should not miss an opertunity to restore peace. Thus until the middle of the Toisho Era things moved on in perfect order in conformity with the wishes of the Emperor Mediji for peace. What was the cappe, then, that brought irregularity to the political circles? The question must be studied from two aspects, internal and external.

I will start with the internal aspect. From the end of the reign of the Emperor Trishe, various cabinets were formed, party cabinets, bureaucratic c binets, coalition cabinets of the political parties and bureaucrats, and others. The political parties, however, almost lost the confidence of the law-abiding citizens, if not the entire nation, through their high-handedness. The bureaucratic cabinets also could not maintain the confidence of the nation in a different sense. Political strife was a struggle for government positions and, again, for personal gains once that positions were obtained. Politicians of the may had no consistent objectives or principles. They led a "hand-to-mouth" political life, living in the present only, caring nothing for the consequences, covoting present easo, and being content when their desires were satisfied. The nation, who were thus disillusioned by the political parties and bureaucrats, thought that men of loyalty to the nation might only be found in the military or the fighting services. Some of the young members of the military, that is, officers frosh from the Military Academy or University, from first or second lieutenants to majors or lietonants-colonels, assumed upon themselves the duties of reforming Japan, and their activitios culminated in the May 15 or the February 26 Incident. If a term "militaries clique" can be used at all, it may be applied to this faction, this gang, which was only a small portion of the military. But no such thing as militarist clique over existed in the fighting services themselves. Unfortunately the military class, the last hope to the Japanese, which was considered from from all the corruptions and incompetences, proved no less scandalous upon its advent to newer then the political parties and bureaucrats, bringing wars and miseries to Japan. I hope I have made it clear in what I said that the sa-called militarist clique never existed in Japan.

External stimuli became manifost after the World War I.

World War I. Japan was given harsh treatment at the Versailles Conference by her former allies, Great Britain and her Dominions. Still harsher was the treatment the United States, Japan's semi-ally, accorded to hor. At the Washington Conforence, which followed, the Anglo-Japanese Alliance was dissolved. And Great Britain and the United States united themselves to put pressure on Japan who was then emerging into a full-flodged power. One is apt to mind other's business and forgot his. The gruth of this will become clear once the attitude of the Anglo-American countries to Japan after the Russe-Japanese War be recalled. Japan hoped at that time to step on the stage of the world hand in hand with the World Powers since she became a full-fledged power, but she found horself completely surrounded by thorns of hostility and antagonism. There is a Japanoso saying "Envy will pursuo merit as its shado." And that was the situation she found her in. The population of Japan, which was 30,000,000 at the time of the Meiji Restoration, reached 70,000,000 at the end of the Taishe Bra. It was increaling steadily by ever 1,000,000 a year. Shortage of feed was a natural outcome. But a placard with "No Japanese Allowed" lettered on it had been reised everywhere in the world. Werse still, the Japanese nationals who had settled themselves abroad were driven out or threatened to be briven cut. The United States, who had remained as a close friend to Japan since she opened her door to the world.

new built a powerful armada with Japan as her potential enemy. Russia had remained a chronic menace to Japan. China, cur neighbour, took full advantage of her policy of befriending distant states and antagonizing neighbours, obstructed the policies of Japan, and gave a rude check to her onset at every apportunity. But the Japanese sabinots romained unconcerned with such national emergency. Politicians who "have not" aspired to "have." Those who "have" tried to keep it. They were intent upon the struggle for political power and acquisition of ornoessions, and had no leisure to give thought to the national crisis or emergency. Under such circumstances, the younger set of the military was more or loss justified in their indignation. Nor was it accidental that some of the nation expressed sympathy towards them. This was the actual situation that prevailed from the end of the Taisho Era to the middle of the Showa Bra, judging from my long experience and observation.

VI. Self-existence, self-defense, and self-respect of Japan.

My observation from the viewpoint of a historian and a newspaparman (I am associated with the press over half a century) tells me positively that Japan is not an aggressive country nor the Japanese an aggressive nation but that she is on the contrary a peace-loving country and the Japanese a mos peace-living nation in the world. It is farthest from the Japanese to look upon the nations of the world with a sense of superiority, for they realize many disadvantages of theirs ---smallness of their country, scarcity of natural resources, lowness of their culture, though they do not show it outwardly. Such realization has led them to imitation, blind following, resistence, or creation of a special milieu, by which they have humoured their sense of inferiority.

Generally speaking, there is no other nation than the Japanese who are so much attached to their own countries. The have a national trait to open their country to the world and absorb anything the world will offer, but it is not in their nature to push themselves on the world. "Norito" or prayers to the God, which is one of the oldest literature, declares that Japan will absorb everything and will not force others to adopt things Japanese. Japan has once said that she has PURL: http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/bb5d6f/many to receive from the world but few to offer it. J believe this is true to the national trait of the Japanese. It also proves that Japan is fully qualified to receive but not to give. In short, the Japanese has absorbtive faculty but little, if none, of expanding faculty. They are attached to thei native places and never forget them for a moment when they are abroad. Even ABE-NO-NAKAMARO, a Japanese overseas student who went to China in the Tao Period and succeeded to obtain an important government position there, wrote in his verse, "Oh Moon that shines over the MIKASA hilli", longing to see the familiar landscape in Nara. Thus a nation who has much of centripetal force but little of centrifugal force never dreams of world domination or encroachment on its neighbours. Why did such a nation then find its way to various places in the world after the Meiji Restoration? It was because of difficulties of living. Shortage of food and clothing drove them abroad in spite of their national trait.

All the moves of the Japanese Government, the people, or rather the entire nation since the Meiji Restoration were motivated primarily by self-existence. That is, the Japanese people began moving out of their country in search of livelihood --- hood and clothing. The second motive was self-defense. These moves were aimed at achieving complete independence, maintaining her prestige as an independent country, and safeguarding such independence from the foreign influences. Wars Japan was forced to be engaged in from the Weiji Pra to the present day were fought mostly for these purposes. They were wars for self-existence and self-defense.

0.164 0002 2040.

The third motive was self-respect. That is, a protest as a result of explosion of dissatisfaction and malcontentment with unfair troutment the World Powers accorded to Japan as an independent State. Japan, on the other hand, fell in the mood that "Alexander was a man, so am I," so to speak, when she saw what the World Fowers had done. She thought it too undignified and pluckless to remain a mere looker on to what Great Britain, the United States, Pussia, Germany and other World Pow rs were doing. Thus, the socalled national "a spiration" should be considered as a motive for her moves. In short, this is nothing but the manifestation of imitative nature with which the Japanese are richly endowed. For example, even a strict abstainer, whether a secretary of a Temperance League or a minister of the Church, will be excited and join in dancing, if wine flows in abundance, songs rise in glee, women whirl in dance. More so for an ordinary man. Suppose that the moves of Japan had been tainted with imperialism, who were they that taught the Japanese what Imperialism is? They were the World Powers, I do not hesitate to say so openly. History of Japan from the latter half of the Nineteenth Century to the early half of the Twentieth Century was not of her own but closely interwoven with that of the world. It shows that Japan was constantly imitating what the senior powers had 0 164 0002 204 1 done, though she might have been clumsy in playing her part compared with the other powers. There is a Japanese saying "People ruin themselves by trying to ape their betters." The saying may be applied to Japan, with this reservation that we the "ruined people" aped was not of their invention but of "their betters." The World Powers, if I may compare them to cormorant, dived into the water and caught fishes big and sme Japan took the suite but failed to catch any fish and droned herself. The folly of the Japanese is indeed unsurpassed. The world Powers that set them such examples may laugh and jeer as much as they please at the clumsiness of the Japanese But censure or condemnation of Japan for it on their part with never be considered as an act of fairness in the eyes of God.

If the Japanese are to be blamed, they should be blamed for their misjudgement of China, the Anglo-American powers, the W.S.S.R., Gernmany, Italy, and most of all Japan haself. As Suntsu said, the Japanese knew neither others nor themselves. This is the cause of the present disaster. disaster. Thus the Japanese have nobedy to blame but themselves. Some Japanese, however, shift the responsibility for the disaster to a limited number of persons, such as military clique or financial magnates and remain unconcerned. The responsibility for all the actions taken by the Japanese PURL: http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/bb5d6f/must rest with all the nation. I do not hesitate to acknowledge even now that I, es a member of the Japanese nation, believed in every letter of the Imperial Rescript on the Declaration of War on December 8 in the 16th year of Showa (1961). I am not in a position to criticise it now in view of His Imperial Majesty's broadcast on August 15 in the 20th year of Showa (1945), but I am convinced that, as the Imperial Rescript said, this was was never welcome to the Japanese but it was a war forced co. them --- a defensive warand that Japan had no other way but to find life in death and to start action without any though for the result since the so called A B C D line closed on he so tightly that she could neither keep still nor find refuge Fven today I still believe in the implications of this Pescript. Although only too short a time has elapsed since then to discuss the matter without prejudice, and although I am conscious of my disadvantageous position as Japanese newspaperman which will probably make my views less accredit than I believe then to deserve, I am none the less convinced that they will no doubt be accepted by unbiased historians who may come a hundred years later.

In conclusion, I should like to talk about myself as a newspaperman. From the beginning of the Taisho Era I was firmly convinced that the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. were two great meances to Japan and warned our people against them. Since my childhood days I have owed much to the Anglo-Saxon civilization. At the beginning of my career as newspaperman, I was so much impressed by "The Nation," a magazine still be: published in New York though under different management, that I named the newspaper I started "The Kokumin Shi umbun," a Japanese equivalent to "The Nacion." So I never hoped to figh against the U.S.A. But after the U.S.A. delt series of blows to Japan concerning the immigration problem and Japanese school question in the Pacific coast or at the Washington Conference, I felt a great danger from the view-point of national defense and self-respect. Accordingly I gave a warning not only to the Japanese but to the Americans as well. Part of my warning was in fact translated into English and published in New York.* ( Japanese-American Relations," by the Hon. Iichiro Tokutomi. Published by The Macmillan Co. N.Y. 1922.) I was quite candid and blunt in this article, but it was because I am a "cardid friend" of the Americans and I hoped from the bottom of my heart that the Americans would change their attitude to Japan. Beside this book, I contribut many articles to magazines and newspapers for the purpose of improving America-Japanese relation-ship. Also the same principle pervades all the rest of my works. But as the situation developed, not only Japan's self-defense and selfrespect were endangered by the U.S.A. but PURL: http://www.legal-tools.org/doc/bb5d6f/ life of Japan became exposed to danger by the abolition of Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, freezing of assets, and embargo of U.S. export to Japan. Now Japan's self-existence itself was involved. Thus the three great principles of Japan since the Meiji Restoration were violated by the Unite States and her allies and Japan was forced to give up hope All my labours were lost, all my works were written in vain. My heart bleeds when I think of the present plight of Japan. Sorrow and shame for my incompetence heavy on my aged heart when I realize that I failed in realizing the teaching of my master Shonan YOKOI, and that all my life's labour as a newspaperman was brought to naught.
